

For kids who are interested in learning more about the history of their hometown, the Mount Airy Museum of Regional History has just the ticket. The Jesse Franklin Pioneers branch of the Tarheel Junior Historians is seeking students in grades four through eight who are interested in joining the group. The club is free to join. Matt Edwards, executive director with the Mount Airy Museum of Regional History, said he is excited about the upcoming year with the historians. Each year, the club delves into a different project that piques the kids' interest. "This is a way to keep things fun and interesting for them. We have something fun in store for the kids this year. I'm not going to say what it is. You'll have to join the club to find out what we are going to do," said Edwards. Last year, the local chapter was named the chapter of the year at the statewide Tarheel Junior Historian Association. Read more: Mount Airy News - Kids who dig history wanted