

This week, kids enrolled at the Mount Airy Museum of Regional History's summer camp are getting their hands on history while learning about everything from the Civil War to how technology is used to discover history.

The camp was originally designed as a Time Traveler program for younger kids in the mornings this week and a History Detective program for the older kids in the afternoons, but, due to a low turnout this year, the camps were combined into one afternoon camp that includes both older and younger kids.

"What that really did was allow the kids to get the best of both worlds," said Matt Edwards, executive director of the Mount Airy Museum of Regional History.

Read more: Mount Airy News - Kids get hands on history during museum's camp